

Indian Government of India Act 1935

The Indian Government of India Act 1935 was passed by the British government to give India some powers of self-government, but the ultimate control remained with the British. It was an important step in the journey towards independence, but it did not give complete freedom.

Under this act, each province was allowed to have its own government and manage local matters. However, important subjects such as defense, foreign affairs, and communications were still under the control of the British government.

The act also introduced limited voting rights, allowing more Indians to vote than before. Still, only educated people or those who owned property could vote in most cases.

The act created a federal system, with powers divided between the central government and the provinces. There were also two houses in the legislature, similar to a parliament, at both the central and provincial levels.

Additionally, the Governor and Viceroy had special powers. If there was any emergency or problem, they could take direct control, overriding the provincial governments.

In short, the Indian Government of India Act 1935 was a step towards self-rule, giving Indians some political rights, but full independence was still far away.
